The Chestnut Charm.

A couple of solid citizens-solid ic avoirda. poise as well as in their bank accounts-were on a horse car a day or two since, when a man came limping aboard apparently suffering from rheumatism. One of the solid men remarked, 'I've never had a twinge of rheumatism in my pants pocket a horse chestnut and displayed it with an air that seemed to imply. "this is the little joker that did the businers. There was nothing visible about that particular horse chestout, different from any ordinary one, x sept its highly polished coat, and this would nardly account for a medicinal virtue not possessed by any horse chestnat. But no sooner had solid citizen No. 1 displayed his chestnut charm with a contended air, than solid citizen No. 2 also drew from his pantaloons pocket a horse chestnut with about the same polish of the first one shows. Said the first citizen: 'I've carried that for thirty years." "So have I carried this for more than thirty years," replied the other; "but I don't carry nine for rheumatism. I carry it for the gout. I have another at home which was picked up at Fontainbleau, but I keep that for Sunday use and let it stay in my meeting clothes." A passenger who had been an interested listener to the foregoing, rather timidly asked one if he really believed there was any virtue in a simple horse chestnut.

"No!" answered the man.

"Then why do you carry the thing about with "Because it don't cost anything and can do no harm if it does no good.' "Ir shows a little superstition, though."

"Very well; I'll shoulder it. In the meantime I shall keep on carrying it. I've carried t thirty years, and have not been troubled with the rheumstism. And I know of others who can testify to the same good result. Then the lame man who had got aboard of the car and was the cause of this episode put his band in his pocket and drew out a horse chestout, and held it up to the gaze of the others A ripple of laughter went up, and the two solid citizens who had pinned their faith to man. But the latter remarked: "Don't laugh, gentlemen; I have faith in the horse chestnut.

My lameness is not rheumatism. I got a sprain a few days ago. I had a touch of the rheumstism, though about ten years ago, and I went and got a yorse chestnut, and have carried it in my pocket ever since. And, gentlemen, I've never had the rheumatism since." Perhaps three men carrying horse chestnuts s rather a big average for a one horse car load of passengers, but there are more mascalines with these chestout charms in their pock its

A FINE ART CAT .- A railway conductor, who lives at Battle Creek, Mich., has a e & which developes a remarkable fondness for music .-Whenever the owner's daughter plays upon the piano, the cat, it she is in the house, will immediately come purring about its mistress, evincing unmistakable signs of pleasure, and keeping time to the music by walking about and rubbing its head against her. If the cat is outside the house and hears the sound of the instrument it will make a great fuss at the door until it is admitted, when it will take its place beside the player and remain there until the piece is finished, when it will jump into its mistress' lap and endeavor, by rubbing against her hands, to induce her to continue playing.

If she complies, the cat resumes its former place at her feet, purring and wilking about her. As soon as the sound ceases it will again jump into her lap and try coaxing, in its dumb way. If she does not immediately flager the keys, the musical mouser will climb upon the ivories, and walk back and forth upon them until the performer either plays or sauts up the instrument. While it is walking on the keys it seems to take great delight in the sounds which it produces from the plano. It takes just as much to the music from an organ or a violin, and it makes no difference who the player is, it will exhibt the same evidence in the mewsical
